The Polynesian.

A Column for Business Men.

A member of the Suffolk bar in Massachusetts, named Matthew Hale Smith, has delivered a lecture before a Commercial Institute in Boston, that is very full of merit. We find it in Hunt's Merchant's Magazine, and make no apology for transferring it with all its length to our columns, and commending it to the careful perusal of our mercantile readers. The lecturer commences his discourse in favor of Useful Labor, by a most appropriate example set to Man by Christ the Carpenter. He says:

"The Savior of men identified himself with the useful labor of life; his public mission did not commence till he was thirty years of age. That long period might have been passed in idleness in the wilderness, or Judea, or on the banks of the Galilee, which washed the walls of the city 'where he was brought up,' or in the caves that surrounded his mountain home; he could have dreamed away listless manhood without toil or want, and found that repose said by many to be so favorable, if not indispensable, to an elevated piety, but not so did he. He became one of us; he knew the stern trials of life. He earned his bread in arduous calling; he knew what toil was beneath the hot rays of the sun of Palestine he met the labor of life. He was known no less as the 'carpenter' than as the 'carpenter's son'; he dignified labor and placed the curse on idleness.

THE SELECTION OF BUSINESS.
Men have physical, moral and mental gifts that peculiarly fit them for some pursuits, and peculiarly unfit them for others; and the taste for, and attraction of, certain pursuits would incline each young man to look well at his choice, to follow it to the end; and his earlier training should have special reference to his position and occupation.

Before his choice is made, he should consider the obstacles in his path, and his fitness to remove or overcome them. Law, medicine, divinity, mechanics, present an inviting field. One may shine in the law who would be a drover in the pulpit; and many a man has attempted to mend a broken limb with not talent enough to repair the leg of a stool.
